An Appreciation of the Popular Edition of the Works of
Mark Rutherford
By Mr. J. A. HOBSON.

"I am particularly pleased to know that Mark Rutherford is to have a chance with the million through your excellently printed little volumes.

"No living truth-teller through fiction exercises a more wholesome charm. In sensibility he is a lineal descendant of Hazlitt and Lamb, and as an interpreter of certain aspects of our inner life he is of unrivalled veracity. . . . I am disposed to think that a fair verdict of the better-educated public would rank him among the half-dozen living writers whose books will live and grow in popular esteem. Personally I regard him as one of three."

RAPHAEL TUCK AND SONS, LIMITED.

The third annual ordinary general meeting of the shareholders was held on Monday at Salisbury House, Finsbury Circus, E.C., under the presidency of Mr. Adolph Tuck (chairman of the company).

The Chairman said:—The profits made by the private firm in the last three years before the formation of the present company amounted to a total of £125,640, a yearly average of £41,880 being thus obtained. The total of the profits realised during the first three years of the present company's existence amounted to £147,238, giving an average yearly profit of £49,079, the figures for the past year being £51,210. This gratifying progress had enabled the directors, after paying 5½ per cent. interest on the preference shares and a dividend of 8 per cent., the ratio held out in the original prospectus, on the ordinary shares, to place within these three years—instead of £13,890, based on the estimated yearly excess of £4,630—to general reserve the sum of £27,629, apart from the capital reserve of £8,845, and to carry forward £4,059, thus giving a total of £40,533, showing an excess of £26,643. He thought that this result, achieved, as it had been during a period which had been anything but brilliant, was one with which the directors had just cause to be satisfied. The seven distinct departments on which the sound structure of the company rested comprised within them practically every phase, every range, and every style of art in commerce, and it was this happy feature which gave their business its great value. Their existing ramifications, extending as they did practically throughout the civilised world, enabled the company to calculate upon the disposal of editions which spread the cost of the original outlay over the widest possible area. Although the company had made their purchases for cash only, the directors had not so much as touched any portion of the gilt-edged investments held by the company, which amounted to nearly one-fourth of their entire working capital. The shareholders would thus appreciate how particularly well placed the company were to increase the business further by the addition of one or another promising department, as opportunities arose, assuming for a moment that the natural growth of the existing departments did not call for the use of this surplus capital. The most valuable asset of their business was the goodwill shown by millions of buyers of their productions throughout the world. In connection with their postcard department, another prize competition, making the third, would be announced within the next fortnight, and the value of the prizes would be raised to £3,000. The fact that the hospitals, educational or other kindred institutions in the United Kingdom would ultimately be the recipients of the bulk of the albums containing the competing sets of postcards would be specially appreciated by all friends of these public institutions. A valuable feature in connection with the company's business was the steady growth in the demand for their publications on the continent. This was turning the tables with a vengeance, for at one time the continent only sold us art goods. The increase in the company's trade there, during the past year more especially, had been so marked that, in addition to the Paris branch, the directors had deemed it advisable to open a separate branch in Berlin. He concluded by moving the adoption of the report and the payment of the dividends recommended—that on the ordinary shares for the half-year ended April 30 being at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, making, with the interim dividend, 8 per cent. for the year.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (director), in seconding the resolution, said: I do not think that, in the present state of the thermometer, I am justified in making a long speech to you, especially after the very full and very lucid and encouraging statement which Mr. Adolph Tuck has given us of the situation of the company. We must remember that we have achieved great results, bringing up our yearly profit from a little over £40,000 to over £50,000 during three years, in which trade generally in the country has been bad. Those who are as old as I am, and who can remember the things that used to pass twenty years ago as birthday cards and Christmas cards and valentines, would see, if some were laid on this table, how strangely the contrast with the oliettes which this company now produces. And we have not only done the community good in this way, but we have done our country very much good, because only a few years ago all this kind of work came from Germany. Colour-printing was done almost entirely in Germany; but now not only do we do our own, but we have established (or are establishing) a branch in Berlin, and in the next few years the current will have been turned, and we shall be supplying Germany with as much coloured printed stuff, but of better quality than they have ever sent to these shores.

After a short discussion the motion was unanimously adopted.

consists of 56 handsomely-bound volumes; is printed in a clear bold type on a specially prepared paper, and contains over 2,000 full-page and other illustrations.

The volumes are written by contributors carefully and judiciously chosen as experts, students, professors of their own period, to expose and interpret their spheres of study to the reading public. All the volumes are in English, but the writers include French, German, Italian, Russian, and Hungarian authors. The result has been an excellence which has not been surpassed in a similar compass.
